Former City Councillor, Berlin

My contribution to the conference will deal with the question of how the Greens perceive metropolitan development between idyll and modernity. In this context, infrastructure policy plays an important role in Berlin. For the third time in Berlin, a red-green coalition of Social Democrats and Greens failed to be realized, although it was possible in terms of the combined percentages, because of the conflicting approaches concerning structural large-scale projects, either gradual or rapidly implemented city development policies, as well as the related financial structures which are the strategic focus of urban politics.

What will be the consequences for our politics?
